THE HIDDEN CRISIS IN RESEARCH WRITING

For me, a "hidden crisis in research writing" means that many students are losing the true value of making a research paper. Research is not just about finishing a task; it is about finding the truth. The crisis is "hidden" because on the outside, a paper might look good, but on the inside, it lacks honesty and deep study. Inadequate or poor referencing contributes to this crisis because it shows a lack of respect for the original authors. When we do not cite correctly, we are not giving credit where it is due, and we make the foundation of our work very weak.

Fake or AI-generated references are very harmful to the academic community. If we use citations that do not exist, we are spreading lies and "hallucinations" in the world of education. This destroys the trust between researchers. For my own career as a future educator, using fake references is dangerous. It can ruin my reputation and my professional growth. If I start my career with shortcuts and dishonesty, I will not become a good role model for my future students at Mindoro State University.

In conclusion, references matter more than we think. They are the proof of our hard work and our honesty. As a student, I realized that I must be careful and responsible in every source I use. Research should be a way to learn, not a way to trick others. By being honest with my references, I am protecting my future and the quality of education.
