I agree with the author's point that teachers often fall into debt because they try to maintain an image of success and generosity. The story of Liam shows how he spent money on expensive trips and treating friends, even though he was borrowing heavily. This is a common problem because many people feel pressured to show that they are doing well, especially when they come from a poor background. The author correctly states that generosity should come from real wealth, not from borrowed money. I also agree that saving for emergencies is very important. Liam had no emergency fund, so when he got sick, he had no choice but to go deeper into debt. This teaches a valuable lesson that having a stable income is not enough if a person does not know how to manage it wisely.

After graduation, I plan to follow a simple financial plan. First, I will save a portion of my salary every month for emergencies. I want to build a fund that can cover at least three months of my living expenses. Second, I will avoid borrowing money unless it is absolutely necessary. I have seen how loans can trap people in a cycle of debt, especially with high interest rates. Third, I will track my spending carefully and live within my means. I believe that being mindful of small expenses can prevent big financial problems in the future. My financial habits include saving first before spending and avoiding unnecessary purchases. These habits will help me achieve my goals, such as having financial security and being able to help my family without going into debt.
